Dear Recruiter,

A seasoned professional, I am currently looking to re-enter the workforce after one year away to take care of family matters. I am highly analytical and, as detailed below, I am also a highly effective communicator. I have superior MS Excel skills and have been developing analytical/reporting tools for over 20 years. My resume is presented in the usual chronological fashion; however, below is a summary of specific areas where I have added value for employers and clients in the past:

Financial Analysis/Budgeting/Planning: In every position I have held, I have either analyzed financial statements or prepared them. At the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, for example, I analyzed complex financial statements and extensive business plans in order to identify risks associated with new business ventures being undertaken by Canadian banks.

Project Management: As an independent consultant for over 10 years, I have gained significant experience in all aspects of project management. I have guided clients at both junior and senior levels from project concept through to solution implementation. I have had significant experience working with internal and external stakeholders in order to reach a common goal.

Communications: I have written a 24-page, quarterly magazine on behalf of one of my clients, MD Financial, for the past ten years. In earlier years, in my role as VP of Sales for a mutual fund company, I delivered presentations to groups that ranged in size from 10 to 200. I have also contributed to management-level, executive-level and board-level meetings throughout my career.

Process Improvement: In one of my very first jobs in a treasury department, I realized that much of the administration could be automated. I developed a number of excel-based processes using macros, advanced formulas and functions that drastically reduced the time required for administrative tasks and monthly/quarterly/annual reporting. I have improved processes in every role that I have had since.

Excited about potential opportunities, please do not hesitate to contact me at 613-261-3520.

Sincerely,

Deirdre Moore, CFA, BBA
