

Psychiatric Drug Cocktails:

is fully-informed consent even possible?

(sample introduction)

Imagine you are a drug manufacturer, such as Johnson & Johnson¹ ("JNJ"), that has developed a new drug for its product pipeline; but, during trials all of its subjects died once the dosage reached 20 mg/day while at 10 mg/day they didn't. All JNJ would need to do is seek FDA² approval for (and market) the lower dose. Right?

But, what if JNJ competitor Sandoz makes a similar drug and recommends a 10 mg/day maximum dose too?

(sample situation)

Next, add a nurse practitioner³ and/or a psychiatrist⁴ who have the unbridled power to prescribe both⁵?

(Insert description of the problem created and insert sample combined risk profiles using manufacturers' product monographs.)

(sample quote)

"Combining so-called anti-psychotic⁶ agents circumvents FDA safeguards and creates totally different risk profiles of which the patient/guardian would likely be totally unaware."

~ Andee Jak

(sample fact)

On 20250329, I posed risk-profile questions to the Erie County Medical Center ("ECMC") Corporation's Internal Pharmacy⁷. Their response? "Don't [contact] us again."

(sample conclusion)

If no one has studied how the risk profile of combined-drugging could impact the patient, then how could anyone ever provide the fully-informed consent that is required for all medical procedures?
